Contemporary Istanbul is mostly studied through the prism of the central districts which are supposed to concentrate the main worthy urban qualities (heritages of the past, diversity of the population, international tourism, international culture economy...). Our viewpoint is to radically give up these academic habits in order to focus the attention on the unknown districts "without qualities", which are now representing the great part of the population and of the urban area. In other terms, the gravity centers of Istanbul have shifted a long time ago to these anonymous territories that are under construction and undergoing an impetuous process of identity building. After having described the main characters of the current new peripheries, we will try to scrutinize the process - peripheries formation and metropolitan integration - that is quite rapidly ensuing.

Dr Hab Jean-François Pérouse is a french scholar in Urban history, currently director of the French Institute of Anatolian Studies (IFEA / Istanbul-USR3131). He used to teach as a professor of urban geography at the University of Toulouse-II. After a PhD in urban geography and after graduating in Turkish language, JFP has taught during many years Middle-East, social and urban geography. He has been working for 15 years in Istanbul as a scholar in different universities and institutions. He works on contemporary Turkey through its urban dynamics. He has published many papers and book-chapters on contemporary Turkey like 'Turkey on: the major changes since 1980 (La Martinière, 2004). He is also a translator into French of Orhan Pamuk's novel Snow (Gallimard).
